Midwest Flying Service is a family-run aviation company based in Sheldon, Iowa, providing charter flights and specialized air transportation solutions since 1992. Operating a versatile fleet capable of flying between 1,200 and 3,500 nautical miles and accommodating six to nine passengers, the company enables clients to travel on their own schedules while accessing smaller airports often underserved by commercial airlines. This flexibility allows travelers to bypass crowded terminals, long security lines, and baggage delays, resulting in a more direct, efficient, and comfortable travel experience.

Medical evacuation and organ transplant flying are central to Midwest Flying Service's operations. With multiple flight crews on call 24/7, the company provides rapid, time-sensitive air transportation for organ transplant teams, ensuring they can reach donor and recipient locations without delay. These missions demand precise coordination, operational flexibility, and uncompromising reliability. Designed to respond at a moment's notice, Midwest Flying Service combines experienced crews with a readiness-driven operation to support lifesaving medical care when every minute matters.

Safety, reliability, and personalized service guide every aspect of Midwest Flying Service's operations. Whether supporting urgent medical and transplant missions or providing flexible charter solutions for business and personal travel, the company remains committed to delivering dependable, responsive, and client-focused aviation services tailored to each mission's unique demands.
